OFFICE OF THE COMMANDING GENERAL

PANTHER DIVISION

TO ALL MEN OF THE PANTHER DIVISION:

This volume, a pictorial review of men and activities of the Panther Division, is respectfully dedicated to each one of you.

The book is published primarily as a keepsake and memento of your service in the Division. As an album of a soldier's life, it is hoped that in the post-war years of your lives this volume may stir up in you a feeling of pride and bring back many warm memories.

It is published also to focus your mind and eye on the organization you have helped to build. As such, it is hoped the publication will inspire you with confidence in your associates and in your Division.

I urge you to mark well the faces pictured here. They are your fellow-soldiers — the men with whom you will share many hardships and sacrifices, a great victory, and the wholesome joys of devoted and enriching friendships.

THE PANTHER DIVISION

"... confident and ready to move into action ..."

The Panther Division, first unit of its size and type in American military history to bear the numerical designation sixty-six, was born April 15, 1943 at Camp Blanding, Florida, where in a simple activation ceremony the Division colors were presented to Major General H. F. Kramer, Commanding General, by Major General Robert C. Richardson, Jr., then commanding the VII Corps of Second Army, to which the 66th Division was initially assigned.

America's traditional faith in a citizen Army was exemplified in this new Division for its original strength consisted of some 15,000 recruits, fresh from civilian life, whose military experience in most cases included a few days spent in one of a dozen induction centers scattered throughout the nation. These potential soldiers were from every stratum of American life, from every state in the union, and they represented practically every trade, skill, and profession.

To mold this raw material into a fighting force, a cadre of officers and non-commissioned officers was selected from the 83rd Infantry Division, then stationed at Camp Carson, Colorado. Added to the cadre were scores of young junior officers just commissioned at the various officer candidate schools—Infantry, Field Artillery, Cavalry, Quartermaster, Signal, Ordnance, Medical, and Chaplains Corps. The Division staff and the key officers in subordinate units, core of the new organization, had been selected in January and February and joined the Division after completing specialized courses in service schools and at command and General Staff School. General Kramer was named Commander by the War Department January 6, 1943. His Chief of Staff was Colonel William E. Donegan, GSC, later succeeded by Colonel John W. Keating, GSC. Brigadier General Francis W. Rollins was placed in command of Division Artillery, and Brigadier General Joseph A. Cranston was named assistant Division commander. General Cranston was succeeded in November, 1943 by Brigadier General James W. Bennett, who in turn was succeeded in March, 1944, by Brigadier General George J. Forster.

Early in May, 1943, the Division initiated an individual training program for the purpose of "teaching our troops how to kill and how not to be killed on the battlefield, to develop leadership and teamwork, to harden the officers and men mentally and physically, and to forge each link in the chain of command." This individual training was completed at Camp Blanding early in August, 1943, and evidence that the recruits of a few months ago had learned the fundamentals of military life was revealed in a score of 93.4% made in tests conducted by VII Corps.

The Division was directed to move to Camp Joseph T. Robinson, Arkansas, August 7, 1943, and opened its new command post at that station August 12. There, during the months of September through December, 1943 the process of developing basic fighting teams went on and training in operations by larger units of combat teams was completed in January, 1944. The new year began with preparations to further integrate the Division as a unit. Problems were conducted in the field during part of January, and in February, under the watchful eyes of XXI Corps of Fourth Army, a series of prescribed division problems was undertaken. The Division was then earmarked to participate in maneuvers scheduled for Louisiana Maneuver Area in April, 1944.

Plans to participate in the maneuvers were interrupted late in March with an order to move to Camp Rucker, Alabama. The Division began this move April 10 and established its command post April 19 at the new station where it was assigned to the IX Corps of Second Army. About this time several thousand replacements from Army Specialized Training Program schools, Infantry Replacement Training Centers, and Army Air Corps joined the Division and for the next few months the immediate task was the training of these replacements to take their part in the Division team. The training process of individuals and subordinate units continued until late in September when the Division again moved into the field for a one-month period to complete individual training, to participate in field problems, and to complete preparations for a movement overseas.

During the year from August, 1943, to August, 1944, the Division was confronted with a major problem in furnishing replacements of trained officers and men for overseas service in other units earmarked for such duty. During that time the Division transferred to ports of embarkation, to other branches of the service, or to other units ready for movement overseas enough officers and men, ranging from generals to privates, to man another entire division. Today, even before the Division is ordered into combat, Panther-trained officers and men are serving on every war front. The task of adjusting to the losses of thousands of men and officers has required relentless and tireless concentration on training. In spite of the losses, the Division continues its preparation for the battle tests ahead—confident and ready to move into action at any time and at any place.

Col. F L Knudsen
Regimental Commander

HEADQUARTERS 263D INFANTRY
Office of the Regimental Commander

Camp Rucker, Alabama

29 September 1944.

It is indeed a privilege to extend my sincere greetings to the Officers and men of the 263d Infantry.

Our regiment is a typical American Regiment. Its members come from all sections of this grand country of ours. Although many of our officers and men have made enviable records in this war, we, as a regiment, have no past reputation to uphold. Since our activation we have come a long way together. We must continue our hard work and devotion to duty in order to set an example of loyalty and sincere comradeship to which our successors will look to with pride.

The officers and men of the 263d have accepted the challenge. I am confident of your ability and determination to do your parts well in carrying out our present mission which is to make our great country invincible.

Sincerely,

John L. McElroy
